THE WORLD

Two rooms, one story. An illustrated desert, painted pink and red, where ghosts keep the artist company. A real living room in Lagos, curtains half-drawn, where a girl keeps dancing. The video cuts between them until you stop noticing the seam.

THE SHOOT

One location, one day, two performers, one song on a loop. The animated side was designed and built in the studio from the same boards, so every live-action angle has an illustrated twin.

THE LOOK

Warm, grainy, hand-held where it needs to be. Blue in the room, pink in the desert, and a cut that behaves like a memory rather than an edit.

INT. LIVING ROOM — DAY

The room is lived in, not dressed: curtains, a standing fan, a gold-framed mirror, speakers on the wall, a portrait of Ojukwu, a cactus print, a jug of flowers on the table. A whiteboard stands where the camera can see it.

INK sits on the sofa beside JOY. She is talking with her hands, excited about something he has not caught up to yet. He is listening the way people listen when they are already thinking about something else.

She stands, crosses to the table, picks up his cup, and stops — deliberately — to smell the flowers. Eyes closed. Then she walks off.

INK leans forward and looks at the whiteboard for a long moment. He picks up his marker and stands. He is one step from the board when she rushes back in, hands the cup to INK, drops a pitcher of drink on the table, picks up her phone, turns the music up and starts to dance.

INK does not move. He just watches her. She is in her element, dancing off into a corner, swaying to the song with no one to please.

He goes back to the table and puts down what he is carrying — the cups, and the marker, which he shakes out first because water has spilled on it. Then he dances towards her, singing along. They fall into a duet nobody choreographed.

CUE: “I JUST WANNA KNOW”

INK steps back, pulls a bundle of notes out of his jacket pocket and starts spraying money on her. He does not stop. Both of them are singing.

CUE: “ONYEOMA”

She sways back to the table as the last of the cash leaves his hand. She pours the pitcher into both cups and serves him. He takes it, lifts it to his face, flashes a smile and drinks. She sips from hers without missing a step, picks up her phone and turns the song up again.

INK nods along, watching her move. She dances off to the corner with her cup at her mouth, loose and a little fanciful.

She dances back to him and holds out a hand. He takes it, plants a kiss on the top of her palm and puts a bundle of notes inside it. She laughs, moves it to her other hand and holds that one out too. He takes it.

She pulls him in. They dance, still unchoreographed.

INK steps back, pulls out more bundles and sprays her again. She tears her own bundle open and sprays him back. They are both laughing, throwing money around, and they stumble backwards onto the sofa.

CUE: THE ROOM TILTS — CUT TO THE DESERT

THE ANIMATED SIDE

Designed and built in the studio in the same week as the shoot: one illustrated body for the artist, one desert, one set of ghosts. The desert is the room redrawn — same furniture, same positions, different physics.

SEQUENCE A — EXT. THE DESERT — DAY

Pink sky, red rock, saguaro cactus flowering white, sand that shimmers where the light lands. Birds cross the frame and fill the track.

The ground opens. A red cryo chamber rises out of the sand with the AVATAR inside it. He steps out carrying an empty paper bag. The chamber sinks back, empty, behind him.

He crosses to a chair set on a rug in the middle of the desert and sits, looking out over the scene he has just walked into.

SEQUENCE B — THE GHOSTS

A ghost drifts past the lens. Cut to the front: the avatar seated, a ghost playing in his arms.

The ghost turns and flies at the camera, and the cut lands in the room.

SEQUENCE C — THE ROOM, REDRAWN

The desert rebuilt to match the live-action room: the cactus stands where the Ojukwu portrait hangs, the ghosts stand where Joy stands. The avatar dances with the ghosts around him, in the same frame the room was shot in.

When Joy leans into Ink on the sofa, the avatar is seated with a ghost leaning into him the same way.

SEQUENCE D — OUTRO

The black ghost slips out of his arms, circles him once and dances to the beat near the cactus. The shot holds, and the credits roll over it.

The logo comes back, the birds come back, the first frame comes back. The film loops.

THE OBJECTS

The avatar. The artist drawn twice — a green suit for the stage, jeans and a black T-shirt for the everyday — so he is the same person in an anime frame and in a room.

The hoverboard. An artefact taken from his own answer about skating: a deck, a flame, a silhouette that survives being drawn from any angle. It floats through the room as well as the desert, so both worlds share one physics.

SHOOT NOTES

Shoot eye-level and centred. Every live-action angle has an animated twin, and the cut only works if the horizon matches.

Keep ceilings and air conditioners out of frame. The room should feel like a photograph, not a location.

Play the song loud, on set. The dance is unchoreographed and has to land on the beat, not near it.

Practical money, practical heat: real notes, real fan, real sweat.

Leave room at the top of the frame for ghosts. They arrive later, and they need somewhere to fly.
